Shorter Skirts For Street Wear—Not So Flaring.

It is said that the bicycle has already begun to influence the fashion of walking costumes, and that shorter skirts will be seen on the street. This will be an innovation to the taste of many women, who, while they are compelled to walk much in all weathers are not ready to appear odd and unfashionable in their attire. It is certainly much pleasanter to be moderately up to date in one's costume than to look different from and worse than anybody else, no matter how convenient and comfortable the odd garments may be. The mental misfit of a garment of the "reformed" species is often a discomfort which entirely outweighs its physical advantage.

VISITING GOWN.

vantages, and in such a case it is doubtful if it is of much real bodily advantage. Un-easiness and anxiety of mind are now recognized to be as prejudicial to health as unwholesomeness of food or clothing.

Some authorities state that skirts are to be much fuller at the top, and that the very flaring form is to be greatly modified. It is suggested that this fullness, which appears at the back and side, implies a return of the bustle, but that is rather doubtful. It has hardly been out of style long enough to warrant a return upon the crest of the wave of fashion. The hoop-skirt was crushed at its earliest manifestations when it last occurred, and if it had not been dealt with so summarily the bicycle would probably have discouraged its progress. A hoopskirt on a wheel would be surely more ridiculous than it was on horseback and during the prevalence of hoopskirts they were actually worn under riding habits.

The cut shows a visiting toilet of gray silk. The godet skirt is trimmed around the foot with a wide band of gray silk on brocade. A short tail of embroidered silk extends over each hip, from the waist. The plain bodice has an embroidered yoke. The bodice has no belt, terminating in a short point back and front. A ruche of silver gray gauze encircles the neck, while a touch of color is added to the costume by the toque of mauve velvet embroidered with silver and trimmed with wings made of silver spangles. Sleeves Likely to Continue Large For Some Time Longer.

There has been some attempt to introduce the close Marie Antoinette sleeve, flaring at the elbow, for evening wear, but there is no present prospect of sleeves being much reduced in size. Such a change must come gradually, for we have become accustomed to the broad shouldered effect, and a sudden shrinkage into small compass of the upper part of the figure would give a poverty stricken and consumptive appearance in comparison with the amplitude to which we are now used. Evening costumes show a tendency toward elbow sleeves with big frills or sleeves that extend a little distance below the elbow and flare abruptly. There are indications of under sleeves or deep frills of lace gathered inside of the sleeve proper.

JACKET.

Women bicyclists in Paris, or "pedaleuses," as the newspapers term them, have adopted the sailor hat as a part of their regalia. There is a great deal of chatter in and out of print as to what sort of lower garment they shall or shall not wear, but practically they wear whatever they like. There is no such thing as establishing a sumptuary rule which shall prevent any individual from being unpleasantly conspicuous. The undesirability of a garment depends mainly upon who wears it. Some women are more noticeable in the ordinary long skirt than others are in trousers. Strike out all the objections to bloomers brought forward by women who, not being bicyclists themselves, have no excuse for wearing them. Strike out also all objections caused by bloomer wearers who would continue to challenge an equal amount of attention whatever they wore, and a very small balance of genuine objections would remain.

Mastic cloth continues to be a favorite for outer garments, and the sketch shows one of the latest jacket models in this material. It is close fitting with a ripple effect. It fastens in the middle with three large horn buttons. The revers and pocket flaps are faced with chestnut velvet. A double pelering of cloth covers the shoulders, each cape being adorned with a narrow bias band of velvet. A similar band trims the turned back cuffs. The jacket is finished with stitching.
